AWDPI Fifth Anniversary Impact Report

SECTION 1

Organization Overview

2025 AWDPI Fifth
Anniversary Impact Report

To create a world of love
and equality for women

1.1 Introduction

Asian Women Development Plan International (AWDPI) is an international non-profit organization dedicated to eliminating discrimination and gender-based violence against overseas Asian women, while advancing their empowerment and development. We strive to create more opportunities for overseas Asian women in the fields of society, economy, culture, education, and beyond, helping them – who used to be marginalized groups – become vital drivers of social progress.

AWDPI operates in countries and regions across Europe, North America, and the Asia-Pacific, with national offices in the United Kingdom, Belgium, the United States, Thailand, and Australia. Over the years, we have built an extensive network of partnerships with United Nations agencies, government departments, international organizations, multinational corporations, and academic institutions.

Our mission

Eliminate discrimination and gender-based violence against Asian women overseas and prompt their empowerment and development.

Our vision

To create a world of love and equality for women.

Our values

Engaging, Embracing,
Empowering.

To create a world of love
and equality for women

Work Background

To create a world of love
and equality for women

1.2 Background

Asian women are among the largest and fastest-growing minority groups overseas, contributing significantly to global political, economic, cultural, and social development. Yet in many western societies, entrenched stereotypes, coupled with the dual identity of being both Asian and female, make their integration into mainstream society challenging, exposing them to persistent discrimination and harm.

In recent years, a turbulent international political landscape and economic downturns have further deepened the security risks and developmental challenges faced by overseas Asian women. Economic pressure, cultural differences, language barriers, and the lack of dedicated support organizations impose heavy costs and risks on those seeking help.

At the same time, high unemployment rates and limited career opportunities restrict Asian women's access to essential resources for survival and growth. For these reasons, overseas Asian women need not only assistance when facing violence, but also concerted international efforts to build an equal and inclusive environment where they can fully realize their potential and contribute to social progress.

2.2.2 Case Stories

Case 1

Survivor's account

I am a mother of three. After immigrating here, I became a full-time homemaker, devoting all my time to raising the children. At first, my husband cared for me and helped me adapt to life abroad. But after the children were born one after another, he grew irritable and angry. He refused to share housework or childcare, and constantly belittled me, saying I “spent his money” and was “good for nothing.”

Eventually, he began hitting me and the children whenever he was dissatisfied. When I tried to resist, he threatened to throw me out and never let me see my children again.

I thought about divorce many times, but as a homemaker cut off from the job markets for years, I worried I would not be able to find work, and without financial security I might lose custody of my children... Every day I felt I was on the verge of a mental breakdown. I just wanted a place where my voice could be heard.

The survivor deeply doubted her own value because her years of domestic labor had long been overlooked, which weakened her confidence to change her situation. We therefore focused our support on restoring her sense of agency and rebuilding her confidence.

Our legal team first helped her understand local laws on domestic violence, divorce, and custody, breaking the psychological hold of her husband's threats about financial dependence. We encouraged her to contact social services and community lawyers, reducing her reliance on her husband for information.

Our language team translated legal documents to ease language barriers.

Meanwhile, our empowerment team helped her explore local vocational training opportunities and encouraged her to seek external childcare support so she could try flexible jobs and gradually reinvest in her own development.

2.2.2 Case Stories

Case 2

Survivor's account

I was working abroad when I met my former partner during a volunteer activity on mental health. At first, I thought that since we shared a cultural background, we could understand and support each other. But as the relationship went on, his need for control grew stronger. He stopped sharing with me emotionally and instead subjected me to constant psychological abuse.

I felt like I was losing myself. Yet the pressures of working abroad and my social isolation made it hard to seek help. I felt trapped in a toxic relationship from which I couldn't escape.

Our support

The survivor's sense of self-value was severely damaged after years in a controlling relationship. At first, we worked to build a safe and trusting relationship with her, helping her reconnect her own identity. Through ongoing conversations, we guided her to recognize the patterns of psychological control at play, so she could see that her struggles were not due to being "too sensitive", but to prolonged belittlement and manipulation. Gradually, she began to rediscover her own strengths and value.

At the same time, we coordinated with psychology professionals and support groups to ensure consistent communication, sparing her the burden of repeatedly recounting traumatic experiences. This created a stable, gentle, and non-judgmental support environment.

2.2.2 Case Stories

Case 3

Survivor's account

I was employed in a small town abroad under a work visa. A local colleague often made crude sexual remarks toward me. I told him clearly that it made me uncomfortable, and he stopped for a while. But one day, after I had been drinking and was feeling low, he kept pressuring me to come to his house. I refused repeatedly, but he continued to touch me. I felt my body was violated.

I finally summoned up the courage to report the incident to my manager, but he dismissed it as an overreaction and refused to take action. I felt unsafe and eventually resigned.

I considered going to the police, but in such a small town I feared retaliation. In the end, I turned to online organization for help.

Our support

At first, the survivor was deeply distressed and experienced frequent traumatic flashbacks, a common response among survivors of sexual violence. To prevent further harm during the support process, we coordinated with psychological and legal teams. Together, we reviewed the incident and identified key legal elements, including whether penetration occurred, whether consent was given, and whether intoxication was a factor. We also encouraged the survivor to preserve potential evidence, including chat records and witness statements.

When she expressed readiness to contact the police and local organizations, our empowerment team compiled available sexual assault hotlines and women's support services in her area.

Once she arranged for in-person counselling, our psychological team continued to provide guidance on emotional regulation and sleep improvement.

Throughout the process, we made sure she never felt doubted or blamed, and reminded her again and again: It was not your fault. You have the right to hesitate, to be angry, and to choose when, or if, to respond. Most importantly, you are not alone. AWDPI will be here whenever you need us.

2.2.2 Case Stories

Concluding Remarks

Domestic violence and gender-based violence cause not only physical and psychological harm, but also establish entrenched patterns of control. For overseas Chinese women, this control is compounded by multiple structural barriers:

- Visa dependency, which places their legal status in others' hands;
- Language and cultural barriers, which limit their access to support;
- Social isolation and fear of retaliation, which silence their voices, trap them in their situation, and prevent them from being believed.

Through our work, we have seen that it is not a lack of will that prevent victims from resisting, but rather the shortage of resources and the immense risks they face while trying to survive.

This is why we focus not only on direct case assistance but also on addressing systemic conditions that allow violence to persist. We work to expand access to information, build support networks, share multilingual legal resources, and encourage survivors to speak out safely, forging genuine, trustworthy, and tangible connections.

We believe that individual assistance is never a one-time act of charity. It is a process of connection, understanding, and empowerment.

4. Future Outlook

Moving forward, AWDPI will advance its mission forward across five key areas: programs, communications, partnerships, fundraising, and governance. Our goal is to improve program quality, expand organizational influence, and strengthen both our professional capacity and long-term sustainability.

Programs: We will continue to strengthen our programs, including the Avoice Program for the Protection of Overseas Chinese Women and the AWDPI Conference of Asian Women Development International, consolidating their brand impact in the global arena. At the same time, we will explore new focus areas—such as addressing bullying of international students and racial discrimination—to ensure our programs remain responsive to pressing needs and the communities we serve. We will also pursue greater professionalism and responsiveness in our case-support services. We will enhance professional training for volunteers, develop practical guidelines and operational manuals, and broaden our resource networks to ensure reliable support for those in need. Ultimately, by building a comprehensive empowerment system, we aim to provide sustainable pathways of support for individuals in need.

Communications: We will continue to refine our communication efforts and strengthen collaboration across domestic and international networks, with a particular focus on overseas Asian communities, grassroots communities, and diverse media platforms, in order to enhance our visibility and credibility. We will also expand our audience reach through the strategic use of emerging technologies and different communication modes and tools.

Partnerships and Fundraising: We will build a more systematic framework for international cooperation, deepen partnerships across sectors, and take an active role in international conferences and initiatives to strengthen our presence in global issues. At the same time, we will continue to pilot overseas crowdfunding programs, broaden the reach of fundraising platforms, and explore diversified fundraising models to strengthen our operational foundation.

Governance: We will continue to improve our governance architecture by clarifying the functional division between headquarters and country offices, and optimizing the financial, human resources, and program management systems to ensure efficient decision-making and orderly implementation. Additionally, we strive to lay a solid institutional foundation for sustainable development by strengthening supervision and accountability mechanisms, embracing digital innovation, and enhancing our capacity for global coordination and resource integration.

We firmly believe that sustained effort and steady progress are fundamental to enduring changes. As we move forward, we will rise to the complex challenges with greater professionalism and strength.
